An oldie but a goodie.

By Jeff

O.K., this book is old. Many of the methods and chemicals are no longer used. At the same time much of what is here is still used today and some of the items are not to be found in other books. This is in fact the book that Weingart used as his reference guide. Much of what is here will prob never be used again unless you are a "retro pyro"; the shell section in particular has very dated material on making the shell casing. At the same time an item called a saucisson (very similar to a comet) is very workable and not to be found in many other places. If you like pyrotechnics and don't mind a little dated material then I would recommend that you give this book a glance. The illustrations are very good. Many of the most highly touted pyro books give you very little in the way of working knowledge. This is not one of them. I personally found the age of the book to be a part of it's (if you will pardon the expression)charm. This is the only book I have ever seen where the author gives you info on how to be sure all of the stars in a roman candle shoot to the same height. The rocket section is my personal favorite. The fact that American Fireworks News chose to reprint this book some time back says a lot from my viewpoint. Don't just write it off because it is "old".

One Star

By Mason Jensen

While I do enjoy this book, it should be known that it is missing about 10 tables of formula.

How your great-grandfather made fireworks.

By deep six

Friends, this book is first-source material for fireworks history thus putting it in the same league with Weingart and Brock's History and, incidentally, making it a splendid companion piece to Stu Carlton's translation of the 1820 Ruggierri. It is not a "cookbook" for how to make stuff that will get you busted by the BATF or how to make Parlon-laced colors. Read it for enjoyment and take a moment to think how Kentish would have loved the volley of shells shown on the cover of this edition and the idea that he was the great-grandfather of that technology!
